Closing Address of the President of the United States on the head of the New Year.

At the last day of the Session of both Houses of Congress, before entering upon a review of the State of the Union, the President took occasion to deliver a message to the people of the United States, and to the Congress of the United States.

The President began by saying that the country had been through a long and trying period, during which much suffering and sacrifice had been endured.

He stated that the country was now in a better condition than it had been for a long time, and that the people were looking forward to a brighter future.

The President then proceeded to speak of the importance of the Union, and the necessity of preserving it at all costs.

He said that the Union was the foundation of the country's prosperity and strength, and that it must be preserved at all costs.

He went on to say that the government was now in a better condition than it had been for a long time, and that the people were looking forward to a brighter future.

The President then concluded his address by stating that he was confident that the country would continue to prosper and that the Union would be preserved.

The President's message was received with great enthusiasm, and was widely hailed as a triumph for the Union.