The Steamship Accident at the Delaware.

The house of Representatives to-day passed an act to confer upon the committee on the steamship accident at the Delaware, the title, power, and authority of a select committee of the United States, to be vested in the committee, and to empower them to appoint a clerk and such other officers as they may think necessary, to be confirmed by the House of Representatives, and to have power to require the attendance of all persons whose testimony may be necessary, and to produce all books, papers, and records which may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and to employ counsel to be retained for the purpose of the investigation.

Mr. Penns told the House that the act was necessary to enable the committee to perform their duties, and that it was expected to be completed within a short time.

The act was passed by a large majority, and is expected to be signed by the President shortly.

The house of Representatives to-day passed an act to confer upon the committee on the steamship accident at the Delaware, the title, power, and authority of a select committee of the United States, to be vested in the committee, and to empower them to appoint a clerk and such other officers as they may think necessary, to be confirmed by the House of Representatives, and to have power to require the attendance of all persons whose testimony may be necessary, and to produce all books, papers, and records which may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and to employ counsel to be retained for the purpose of the investigation.

Mr. Penns told the House that the act was necessary to enable the committee to perform their duties, and that it was expected to be completed within a short time.

The act was passed by a large majority, and is expected to be signed by the President shortly.